(b) (1) (b) (3)

CIACLAS___NID_93-455 JX___

Director of Control Intelligence

NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE DAILY

Tuesday, 9 March 1993

Top Secret

CPAS NID 93-055JX

y March 1993

APPROVED FOR RELEASE DATE: OCT 2005

			Top Secret
	Contents
Notes
	Rwanda: Ceaso-Fire	Agreement Announced	0
		Almounced	8

Top Secret

9 March 1993

RWANDA: Cease-Fire Agreement Announced  Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone. government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued to make advances near a provincial capital.		Top Secret
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Government negotiators and the Tutsi-dominated rebels have agreed to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued	RWANDA: Cease-Fire Agreement	Announced
to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting that has displaced nearly a million people, but prospects for renewed peace negotiations later this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued	-
this month are still in doubt. The agreement, to go into effect tonight, calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued	to a cease-fire in the ethnic fighting	that has displaced nearly a calls for rebel forces to withdraw from areas captured since 8 February and for the approximately 240 recently deployed French troops to leave. The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued	million people, but prospects for re	enewed peace negotiations later
The OAU, with help from a UN-sponsored international force, is to monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued monitor a demilitarized zone.  government representatives are uncertain whether President Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued
Habyarimana will support the agreement, and the rebels have continued		onsored international force, is to
·
Comment: Habyarimana has undercut previous peace talks and is	- likely to oppose parts of this agreement, particularly the departure of	likely to oppose parts of this agreen	ment, particularly the departure of French troops. New talks stand a good chance of deadlock as long as Habyarimana continues to believe that the cease-fire agreement and	French troops. New talks stand a go	ood chance of deadlock as long as earlier discussions on power sharing are unacceptable. Fighting may	TRADVALIGICADA CONCIDIONS IN DEGRAMA	TO ALL THE CEASE-HE SPICEMENT AND resume if the OAU is unable to establish demilitarized zones quickly.	earlier discussions on power sharin	g are unacceptable. Fighting may

9 March 1993